Relationship breakdowns are the most common cause of homelessness, with many people having lost or broken relationships with family, friends, partners and children. People who use harmful behaviours in relationships and people who have experienced harm are particularly vulnerable to homelessness and forming unhealthy relationships in the future.

This five-week course explores what makes a healthy and relationship, how society shapes our views about relationships and recognising when behaviours become abusive. The sessions will help you discover your needs and triggers, develop strategies for emotional regulation and understand consent, boundaries, and how to access help if your safety is at risk.

Do you struggle with a ‘racing mind’ or feel unable to switch off?

It is common for people with housing insecurity, previous trauma, neurodiversity or other issues to feel like their thoughts are unmanageable. Preoccupation with the past or worries about the future can prevent people from processing their feelings or managing their lives in the here and now, causing distress, exhaustion, procrastination and/or impulsive behaviour.

Understanding mindfulness and learning to be mindful can be very effective in bringing yourself into the present, gaining perspective, letting go of judgement and slowing down the mind. Mindful meditation and other mindfulness techniques can enable you to soothe, soften and give space to your experiences, creating acceptance, releasing you from negative beliefs and allowing you to grow into a new confidence.

This group provides a weekly opportunity to meet up, relax and have fun while participating in healthy outdoor activities such as football, tennis, pitch & putt or gardening. You could benefit from regular social connection, improved physical and mental wellbeing, developing motivation and purpose, and discovering new activities that you look forward to and enjoy.

Managing a home without support can be daunting due to a new daily regime of tasks, costs and responsibilities which must be met consistently now and in the long term.

If you are preparing to move into independent accommodation or have secured housing after being homeless then this group is an opportunity for you to share experiences, challenges, support and solutions with others who understand your situation. Staff from local services will share information and advice on topics such as managing benefits, staying on top of your bills, employment, mental health, repairs, self-care, community involvement and how to get support. You will be supported to solve problems together, improving your confidence in building a secure and fulfilling future in your new home.
